EXTRACT.

AN EX-AMERICAN MINISTER ON THE END OF THE SIEGE OF PARIS.

At nine o'clock in the forenoon of March 1, 1871, three hundred Hussars belonging to the German army entered the Porte Maillot, proceeded up the Avenue of the Grand Army, and walked their horses slowly down the magnificent avenue of the Champs Elysées, with carbines cocked and fingers upon the trigger. These Hussars looked carefully into the side streets, and proceeded slowly down the avenue. But few people were out at that early hour in the morning. Soon after this, six more Hussars made their appearance by the same route, and after every few minutes thereafter the number increased. They came in the main body of the advanced guard, numbering about one thousand men, consisting of cavalry and infantry (Bavarian and Prussian), forming part of the Eleventh Corps, under the command of General Kanamichi. By this time the crowd on the Champs Elysées had increased, and met the advancing Germans with hisses and insults. A portion of the German troops halted, and with great deliberation, loaded their pieces, whereat the crowd, composed mostly of boys and "roughs," incontinently took to the hills. According to a previous understanding among the French, all the shops and restaurants along the route had been closed; but, notwithstanding their vigorous assurances that no consideration whatever would induce them to look upon or speak to the Prussians, I found, on going down the Champs Elysées at half-past nine o'clock, a large number of them attracted thither by curiosity which they were unable to resist. In walking down the avenue to the point where the main body of the force had halted in front of the Palace of Industry, notwithstanding the vehement protestations that had been made that no Frenchman, would look at or speak to a German soldier, I counted a body of twenty-five French people—men, women, and children—in the most cordial fraternization with the German soldiers. Stopping for a moment to listen to the agreeable conversation which appeared to be carried on in German, I turned out to the clerk at a hotel at Hamburg, les Bains, where I had lodged during my visit to that place in 1867 and 1868. From what I could learn, the great body of the German troops were received by the Emperor at L'Orangerie, before their entry into Paris. Just as, therefore, of the mass of the troops entering at six o'clock, as had been previously announced, it was not until half-past one o'clock in the afternoon that the Royal Guard of Prussia, in four solid bodies, surrounded the Arc de Triomphe. Then a company of Uhlan, with their spears stuck in their saddles, and mounted by the little flags of blue and white, headed the advancing column. They were followed by the Saxons, with their light-blue uniforms, who were succeeded by the Bavarian riflemen, with their heavy uniforms and muskets. Afterward, followed more of the Uhlan, and occasionally a squad of the Prussian cuirassiers, with their white jackets, black hats, and waving plumes, reciting to mind, perhaps, among the more intelligent French observers, the celebrated embassy of Nansouty and Li T'ou Hsiang, in the wars of the first Napoleon. Now came the artillery, with its plies of six, which must have extorted the admiration of all military men by its splendid appearance and wonderful precision of movement. Next fell into line the Royal Guard of Prussia, with their shining cuirasses and glittering bayonets, which had been massed around the world-renowned Arc de Triomphe, erected (and with what bitter sarcasm it might be said) to the glory of the grand army. I witnessed this entry from the balcony of the apartment of a friend, Mr. Coadin, of New York City, which was at the head of the Champs Elysées. A good many French people were on the sidewalks on either side of the avenue. At first the troops were met with hisses, cat-calls, and words of insolence; but, as they passed in thicker and faster, and forming companies, as they swept down the avenue to the strains of martial music, the crowd seemed to beawed into silence, and no other sound was heard but the tramp of the soldiers and the occasional word of command. The only disturbance that I saw was occasioned by some individual advancing from the sidewalk and giving his hand to a German cavalryman, whereat the crowd "went" for him. But his bucking seemed so powerful that the discontents soon dispersed without any further disturbance. The entry of the main body of the troops occupied about two hours, and after that they began to disperse into the various quarters of the city to which they had been assigned, in search of their lodgings. We were busily engaged at the Legion almost the entire day, endeavouring to secure protection for the American apartments and property.

BULLETIN OF TROOPS ON FOREIGNERS.

At five o'clock I went to see M. Jules Fauré in relation to the sudden and indiscriminate billeting of the German soldiers upon the American residents, and learned from him of the probabilities of the ratification of the treaty of peace by the Assembly at Bordeaux that evening, and of his hope that everything would be settled before the next morning, when the German troops would be withdrawn from the city. He told me that there would be no doubt about the ratification of the treaty. He hoped it would have been ratified the night before, and thus have prevented the entry of the Germans into Paris at all. But M. Thiers unfortunately had been delayed in reaching Bordeaux, and which had postponed the action on the treaty in the Assembly until that day. M. Fauré was kind enough to tell me in this interview that he would send me a notice of the ratification of the treaty the moment he received it; and he kept his word, for as soon as the matter was completed he sent me the notice. In returning from the Foreign Office, on the other side of the Seine I found the bridge guarded by French soldiers, who resolutely refused to let me pass. Soon a large crowd of roughs appeared and attempted to force the guard, and it appeared for a short time as if a sharp little battle was to be improvised. After standing around for about an hour I was enabled by the courtesy of a French officer to slip through the guard and finally to reach my residence. My coachman was so thoroughly penetrated with fear of the Prussians that he utterly refused to harness his horses again during the day. I wrote an account of this entry of the Prussians into Paris at eleven o'clock the same night. The day had opened cloudy and sombre with a raw and chilly atmosphere.

NOTICE OF PARIS.

A little after noon the sun had come out bright and warm, and the close of the day was magnificent. I sent two gentlemen out of the legation in the evening to go through the city and report to me the situation. From the Boulevard du Temple to the Arc de Triomphe not a store, or a restaurant was open, with the exception of two of the latter on the Champs Elysées, which the Germans had ordered to be kept open. There were no excited crowds on the boulevards. What was very remarkable, and without precedent in the memory of the oldest inhabitants, not an omnibus was running in the whole city, and every omnibus office was closed. Neither was there a private or a public carriage to be seen, unless a carriage could be deemed and taken as a "public carriage"; unfortunately, too many of these were then seen in every hour of the day. Paris seemed literally to have died out. There was neither song nor shout in all her streets. The whole population was marching about as if under a cloud of oppression. The gas was not yet lighted, and the streets presented a somber and sombre aspect. All butcher and barber shops in that part of the city occupied by the Germans were closed, and if the people had not provided themselves for the emergency there would have been an excess of suffering. The Bourse was closed by the order of the Syndics of Change. No newspapers appeared on that day except the Journal Official. No placards were posted upon the walls of Paris, and I could hear of no act of violence of any significance. It is but just to say that the people of Paris bore themselves during all that cruel experience with a degree of dignity and forbearance which did them infinite credit.—Scriber's Magazine.
